| Krótki opis / Short description |
| MA Seminar focus: Individual learner differences in L2 acquisition: Classroom-based research The seminar is designed to suit those prospective students who are interested in investigating individual differences of language learners in the process of foreign language learning. Since the course addresses the research area focusing on applied linguistics, it may be particularly interesting to those who want to specialize in the teaching profession. The context of research suggested for the seminar group will be a foreign language classroom, where learners differing in their cognitive and affective characteristics face numerous challenges and successes in foreign language attainment. By the end of the seminar a participant is expected to complete an MA thesis, following the APA style research format. In the course of the seminar, the students will be familiarized with the procedures of conducting research in Applied Linguistics. |
